Not illustrated. 1874 Excerpt: .I do not propose to introduce it as a chapter in elementary geometries; but that I do consider it as representing what is to my mind the only satisfactory treatment of the logical question, except so far as it may be put in a more condensed shape by the help of algebra. Having regard to the differences of opinion which exist among us (the teachers) not only upon details, but upon fundamental questions, in this matter of proportion, I entertain the gravest objection to giving forth to our pupils, under the sanction and in the name of the Association, an accidental compromise, as a geometrical gospel. We digress for a moment to endorse what Mr. Merrifield has so well said about postponing difficulties till after the student has become acquainted with his subject. The learner is no competent critic of what he is being taught, and...
