Excerpt: . . . THE CHOICE. A LL in some vale remote Ill live, Far from the worlds loud noise; There neither love, nor hate, nor grieve, But feast on sober joys. In peaceful ways, my golden time, As limpid streams shall flow, Unknown to care, disease, or crime; Not kings live always so. Along the meadows will I sport, With lambs in harmless glee; Not such the joys the wanton court, But such the sports for me! Say, does the beau, of essence vain, A scent so sweet exhale, As yonder odours of the plain, That load the balmy gale Or does the belle so sweetly smile, In vestments not her own, As flowers, that neither spin nor toil, In Natures robes alone Lo in the rose, with crimson light, The pearly dew-drops shine; More sweet the rose, the pearls more bright, Than, wanton Sappho, thine! Do...
