I.--On the Arrangement of Mineral Collections. The notice, in your Number for January, of a new system of Mineralogy, c. by Professor Thomson, will excite the attention of your readers: and I wish to profit by the occasion, to examine the relative advantages of the chemical and natural arrangement of mineral collections. My own experience, such as it is, has led to the preference of the latter mode; and the object of this paper will be, to give, in very general terms, the reasons for that preference: reserving details for a more advanced stage of the discussion, into which I wish to draw either Professor Thomson, or one of his qualified pupils who may have more time to spare. In the case of private collections, there may be different motives for preferring the one or the other; or, what is rather more common, something between the two. The miner would prefer the analytical order; the lapidary the natural; the virtuoso would spare himself the labour of a strict arrangement, by adopting the intermediate or compound; and the naturalist, perhaps, a divided system; arranging chemically those species which depend, for their scientific or practical interest, on their elementary ingredients; and according to their physical properties, those which owe their interest chiefly or altogether to those properties. For mineralogy, though so intimately connected with chemistry, is certainly a...
